I came across a poem that I think feels right for this moment:
Ever
Meghan O'Rourke Never, never,
never, never, never.—King Lear
Even now I can't grasp "nothing" or "never."
They're unholdable, unglobable, no map to nothing.
Never? Never ever again to see you?
An error, I aver. You're never nothing, because nothing's not a thing.
I know death is absolute, forever,
the guillotine—gutting—never to which we never say goodbye.
But even as I think "forever" it goes "ever"
and "ever" and "ever." Ever after. I'm a thing that keeps on thinking.
So I never see you is not a thing or think my mouth can ever.
Aver: You're not "nothing." But neither are you something. Will I ever really get never?
You're gone.
Nothing, never—ever.

Mark Garcia The Loving Husband February 8 at 9:24 AM

My dear precious pet, I will miss you more than the English language has words to describe. There is a void in me that can't be filled, despite all the family and friends that surround me. I am not lacking for love on this earth, just your presence in my life everyday I wake up. I will love you all the days of my life until death takes me from this earth and I am reunited with you for eternity. Your loving husband Mark.

We have been neighbors with Mark and Nikki for 40 years and will miss her bright, cheery smile, laugh and wave whenever we met at the mailbox or she drove by. The most lasting memory was just last year. At Doris's garage sale, Nikki talked Mark into buying an antique, very large and VERY heavy sorghum press with an equally heavy attached cauldron for cooking molasses . A couple hours later, we looked out the window to see Nikki hanging onto the press trying to steady it, steer it and keep it on Hiawatha Rd while Mark towed it to their house behind their lawn mower. It was slow progress, but they made it.

Flying with family from Cincinnati, Ohio to Florida for the wedding, left me surprised to see Nikki greeting us at airport Especially since she was the bride and had curlers in her hair There were 5 of us I think, with a lot of luggage But that was just fine because Nikki drove a big Old DeSoto that had a huge trunk The car was as classy as Nikki was
